

Somava Saha: I think it starts by recognizing and believing in that inherent capacity that every person has to contribute. In my faith tradition, I'm a Baha'i, it's this belief in the inner nobility of each person, that everyone has a piece of the puzzle that's needed for the healing of the world. But, it takes more than that. When you acknowledge and recognize that there are systems of oppression that are leading to that trapped, and perhaps untapped, human potential, your obligation first is to lift those systems of oppression, to ease them, to remove them, so that those gifts can be expressed.
